On Moving

Next month the American Nuclear Society will start publishing this journal through the Society's central offices in Hinsdale, Illinois. More exactly, the Society's Malcolm Ferrier and his staff will take over, and we editors will send manuscripts to him rather than to our old friends at Academic Press. There is more to this than changing ZIP codes.

Academic Press started publishing our journal for us when we could not possibly have done it ourselves, and we think they have done a fine job. The relationship with them has been a friendly one, and there have been many instances in which we needed just this, for we are really amateurs at the publishing business, earning our livings in other ways. For example, we are sure that it is not easy for a publishing house to bring to the attention of an editor that the index is overdue and that a deadline is in jeopardy, but Academic, in the cheery personage of Mrs. Roselle Coviello, can do it, pleasantly, precisely, and effectively. We will miss her very much. And her very helpful staff, particularly Irene Kornegay and Julius Sulmonetti. Alan Liss, who started us off and is now a vice-president, has our gratitude too. It is no surprise to us, who have had such cordial relations with these people, that the knotty problems of terminating our connections with them have been smoothly handled. Thanks to their generosity and helpfulness, we will be able to continue sending the journal to libraries and distributors throughout the world as was done previously by Academic on their own.

We feel sure that you will like the work of Malcolm Ferrier and his staff and that the society-produced journal will please you.
